Abstract: Ethical self-knowledge has been a focus in social work literature. This paper reflects on the importance of ethical self-reflection in social work. It discusses the role of critical reflection and critically reflective practice in social work. The paper argues that critical reflection is essential for social workers to maintain ethical self-knowledge. The significance of reflexive theory is also highlighted. The paper concludes with a call for more critical and radical social work literature.